SLINGS AND ARROWS

By HUGH CONWAY.

Author of "Called Back," "Dark Days,"
"A Family Affair," Etc.

CHAPTER IX .- Continued.

But suddenly she turned her head and aw me. She starfed to her feet, and, with a low cry which told of pain, even borror, turned and fied toward the house.

I followed, overtook has and seized her hands. "Viola! my love! my wifn!" I cried, "why do you fly from me?" She made no reply, but struggled to free

"Speak! look at me, dearest!" I pleaded,
"Tell me all—I can forgive! Tell me nothing save that you love me!"

She looked at ms; her eyes were full of fear. "Let me go," she said hoarsely, "or ! "Never!" I said, "until you have told me all, What does it mean! What am I to think?"

She laughed wildly. "Think? Think that I am lalse to you—that I love another—that I hate you! But let me go. Julian, let me go!"
Her voice sank to piteous entreaty as she "Never!" I repeated. I wound my arms round her, and kissed her passionately. She trembled in every fiber of her body, and trembled in every fiber of her body, and when once more her eyes met mine, the look in them positively frightened me.

Suddenly, by a supreme effort, she tore herself from my arms and flet rapidly toward the farm. I was on the point of pursuing her, when a great revulsion of feeling came to me. What had I done that this woman should shrink from my touch—should regard me with dread and horror! I had lavished love upon her; I was willing to take her to my arms without a word of explanation, or an entreaty for pardon for explanation, or an entreaty for pardon for the misery she had caused me. Yet she fied from me as if I were some noxious reptile. However deeply and blindly a man may love, there must be a limit to his self-abasement; so, as I strode into the house, to find, not her, but Eustace Grant, my heart was full of black and bitter thoughts against the woman I loved.

I entered Grant's sitting-room without either knock or warning of any sort. He was seated, and, apparently, in earnest conversation with a pale, sweet-faced woman, some ten years his senior, and who was dressed as a Sister of Charity. He started to his feet, and looked at me like one astonished.

I were sione.
"Well!" he said, calmly, "You have seen her?"

"Yes, in spite of your subterfuge." "I acted but for the best. It was only this morning I knew they were coming Some absurd report of my recent illness had reached my sister. Not having heard from me for weeks and weeks, she came to learn the truth."

"Came from where?" "From Nantes. She is the superior of a sisterhood there. She is my half sister. Her mother was a French woman."

"But Viola! Why is Viola with her?"
"She has been in her charge ever since she left you. It was to my sister I took her." A thought crossed me. "Surely," I said,
"Viola, a married woman, can bind herself by no vows! She is not one of the sisterhood?"

"The sisterhood is a purely charitable one. Persons can leave it at discretion. Viola has been my sister's guest, that is all." "Grant," I said, "I am now under the same roof as my wife. She shall not leave it until I know everything. From her lips I will learn the meaning of her conduct. Go and send her to me."

He said nothing. He left the room, and in a few minutes returned, leading my wife. She sauk wearily upon a chair, with her fin gers nervously moving one against the other. I had now time to notice what man who has suffered. Youth was still there, but the gayety and exuberance of youth were missing. Viola's cheek was paier than of old; her figure looked slighter, altogather she was more ethereal—more fragile looking. For a while she kept her oyes away from me; then, finding I did not speak, she looked at me. Her eyes were full of tears.

"Eustace tells me you want to speak to Healless of Grant, who was still with us. I besought her, implored her to enlighten me, or at least to say that she love! me still; that, now we have met, we should part no more. In vain! Again and again her lips formed the sad yet firm refusal. At last she said: "Ask me no mora, Julian; is is for your sake that I am silent."

For my sake! Grant's parrot cry! I rose in bitter anger and turned to Grant.
"Tell her," I said—"tell this woman, who bears my name, and who is still my wife, that nothing can make life more terrible to me than this concealment. Tell her in what frame of mind I met you. Bid her that the concealment was and war officials were on the best of terror.—Chirago News "Rambler." speak. You have power over her, She will listen to you, if not to me."

"Viola," said Grant, in a strangely solemn voice, "be is right; we are wrong. He must know the truth."

She raised her white face, "Never—never!' she moaned.

e question.
"I am too near—too near to England,"

she said, in a low, pained voice.
"Too near to me, you mean?"
"Yes! There must be thousands of mile between us."

I stamped in my rage. I was tried past endurance. Her one thought, her only wish, seemed to be that of avoiding me.

"Go!" I cried, "and may I never gaze again on your false, fair face! Go! and carry with you the memory of the life you have ruined, the hopes you have blighted, the love you have thrown away! Go!"

I turned on my heel, but in the small mirror over the fireplace I saw Viola riso, pale and tottering. I saw Grant place his arm round her and support her.

"I cannot bear it," I heard her say. "I can bear all for his sake, except his reproaches. Eustace, when I am gone let him know all. Not until I am gone. Julian, farewell!"

farewell!"
I turned at the last words. Viola wa passing through the doorway. I sprang forward, but Grant checked me. The tears icrward, but Grant checked me. The tears were rolling down his checks.

"No," be said, "Leave her. No good can be done. You will kill her if you see her again, Julian, leave the house for an hour; they will be gone by then. Trust me—believe me, it is better so."

"But I am to be told everything?"

"Yes, when she has left England."

"No, now! Tell me now! Whatever it may be that divides us, I can sweep it away. I can hinder her from going. I can hold her to my heart and keep her. Speak! If you are sworn to keep her secret awhile, for my sake, for her safe, break that vow, and let me know everything this moment!"

and let me know everything this moment!"

He laid his hand on my shoulder. "Julian, my poor fellow," he said in voice full of feeling, "if you have any hope, abandon it. No love, no power on earth can bring Viole heek to you!"

some ten years his senior, and who was dressed as a Sister of Charity. He started to his feet, and looked at me like one astonished.

"You bere, Loraine!" he cried.

"Yes; I did not get so far as L'Orient." Grant moved toward the door. "Excuse me," he said; "I shall be back in a moment. This is my sister." The lady bowed, and smiled pleasantly.

"You are too late Grant," I said, somewhat coldly. "You cannot prevent the meeting; it has taken place."

"Poor girl!" he said. Then turning to Here I wandered about until late dragged myself back to the farm.

Grant, with a face full of anxiety, was waiting my return. I threw myself into a chair, buried my face in my hands, and, I believed, sobbed. The disappointments of the day, the threatened hopelessness of the future, had completely broken me down. I felt as a man must feel who is on the verge of suicide.

"My poor boy, it would be cruel to deceive you—none!"

I groaned. "Let us go away," I said.
"Come with me to England—to Loudon.

He says that, as a rule, the treatment of newspaper correspondents by army offi-cers was extremely courteous, and that every advantage was furnished them. No censorship of "copy" was established, and correspondents were allowed all the liberty designated by their passes. Of course, there were some of them who abused the confidence and hospitality of the officers, and even worse than that, and such men found it very difficult to terms.-Chicago News "Rambler."
